First Do No Harm is not a long book, and I felt there were too many internal struggles in too few pages. Also, the rising action was relatively long, making the resolution abrupt and denouement too short. But I guess the too slow build was mainly caused by the plot line being a little all over the place.

However, "first, do no harm" is either inane, insulting, disingenuous, or misleading. It is either a self-evident cliché, or it is a pernicious distortion of true medical practice. Every medical intervention causes harm. It is impossible to "do no harm", and by continuing to pretend we can, we are hurting our patients.

For first responders, those decisions should include the maxim "First, do no harm.". Responders need to be taught how to conduct a quality size-up, capturing clues and cues about what is happening in their environment. Then they need to be taught how to assess those clues and cues into coherent meaning.
