Hana Highway, you'll find a road on the left past mile marker 16 down to the village of Keanae. Pay attention to the jagged, black lava rocks and note that there is no swimming here due to the dangerous and rocky shoreline. A traditional Hawaiian village, Keanae is known for its taro fields, much like their ancestors.

Going to Hana is about the journey, not the destination. There are wilder roads, steeper roads, and more dangerous roads, but in all of Hawaii, no road is more celebrated than this one. It winds 50 miles past taro patches, magnificent seascapes, waterfall pools, botanical gardens, and verdant rainforests, and ends at one of Hawaii's most beautiful tropical places.

There is no indoor facility in Hana big enough to house the taro festival and its 40 arts and crafts and 20 food vendors, Orr added. "I think what Hana needs is a civic center," she said. As far as driving on the field was concerned, the vehicles would damaged the field due to the soggy conditions, Orr said.
